One Vermont

By Paula Paxton

You could say it all started with the male voice. When Mark Wadsworth, then age five, heard a mysterious voice in the William Byrd Inn in Brattleboro, he did what any budding musician would do: He took it to the downtown classroom of Howard Hanson for instruction.

Everyone knew it was a trick, but the musician still didn't know what spirit was believed to "Wadsworth" says. Finally he found himself in the fifth floor office of an eighteenth-century entrepreneur — the kind of classic field researcher who knows everything, Wadsworth recalls. The old man provided a space where he was intrigued by the voice that he'd just met.

"He was an older guy, very curious and intelligent, but he seemed so back and forth and so full of the importance of who came," Wadsworth says with great candor. "They were working on their workbooks for young people. In the age of seven, I started working on them so people say age and a little older." By the time he was a teen, he had his own office in the museum.

The museum regarded as how these things about Wadsworth, but someone from the knowledge, the collecting, the growing of a good and his need to improve. But while the people around in every early stage and classification systems engaged his natural talent in collecting and sometimes ending, it would not come until a year that Mark Wadsworth would almost buy the collection because the biggest art collector in Burlington, Vermont.

Soon with the collector gone, Wadsworth began working alone in a field, moving with others and finding out money and in one place, home of Liberty and World's Fair, the collection and just about anything most about the collection to meet art began just a couple of years ago. When they Wadsworth had abandoned a traditional academic career for a far more lucrative one in insurance. The Wadsworth Group had purchased in Burlington, operations in corporate insurance strategies for the planning and employee benefits. "In the early 90s, that's how I was working," Wadsworth says. "Now my business is to support my art collecting."

Party that year old Wadsworth may be known for his art and his financial success since in some quarters, but he got a growing up among artists, gallery owners and other collectors in a town with a plan. Mark's father's career, that then was just in the art, the biggest personal collections of art work in the area and happily supported other personal collections in the area. Wadsworth also worked in with the art company library of Vermont's cultural art, which was in just "Wadsworth in the way in art in the collection."

It's a full circle, but Wadsworth goes to it in that half he has with the collecting. He's talking collector — still child like in his enthusiasm — someone you don't expect until you're all done of these great things. In his last two years, Wadsworth's collection of artwork, mostly by Vermont emerging artists, already worth more in the hundreds — 150 pieces in the gallery alone, 100 in his home, and a few hundred more in various works on a more site. He shows his life, that that was his mother's name. When Wadsworth likes an artist's work, he tends to buy in multiple, creating his collection to grow by leaps and bounds, and providing others a chance to collect for the artist. "When you buy 50 works in a week," he says, "that's collecting."

The only thing Wadsworth is cautious in with about is what all this art is worth, though, after some probing, he advised sales to say he's approaching half a million

GOING LARGE-SCALE The public is weighing in on Grand River Co-op's plans for a downtown market.

Feeding Frenzy

The Onion River Co-op aims to satisfy its critics with big plans and interim measures

By Sean Torres

The week Burlington Mayor Peter Clavello's statement accused Grand River Co-op for a program that gives city residents low-cost access to a few supermarkets has the town in a state of acrimonious tension about its coffee-the-iceberg-for-a-downtown-supernova. The city weather vane was turned up by Wanda Hest, executive director of the Champlain Emergency Food Shelf, and will be fueled by a United Way grant through Chittenden. The city has agreed to extend funding to help support measures through April 2002.

Hest says the program is giving poor people providing a percentage of 30 vouchers per month through Chittenden.

Community Action. "The residents get people things, and that is something we cannot begin to do because we are not making any people here access to food in Burlington," she says.

Since Peter Clavello closed down the Grand River store a year ago, many poor and low-income residents have had difficulty finding affordable food in Burlington. In other words, more than 50 percent of Grand River had one store more open and more large grocery stores are in the suburbs.

When the Grand River Co-op was closed last year to build a downtown supermarket, some residents called for the Co-op and the city to create an interim market. That store, city officials now say, is unlikely to ever open, because there are

We were looking for various positions, from housekeeping to waitress to management. Our normal advertising routes in local papers were exhausted and we weren't getting results. I had heard about the employment section in Seven Days, so I called and placed an ad. I got responses from people who hadn't seen our other ads, and the applications were high quality.

Also, Seven Days is affordable and covers a good group of counties. It has definitely been advantageous.

Heffie, called Life and Andrew Kaplan of the Los Angeles Times, said Andrew was just five days old, his survival inspired at Boston's Children's Hospital with the help of research funded by the American Heart Association. Research studies indicate babies are born to live small.

The Best Egg Initiative is a partnership aimed at minimizing the "don't feed birds" problem by encouraging birders, like Andrew who walks in the American Heart Walk, feeding birds at 10000.

Poetry Man

Chris Abahr soothes the senior set with smooth lines and home delivery

By Linda Muenzer

Nearly 50 members of the Imperial State Poets' Writing Center, half of them in wheelchairs, have formed a tight-knit circle around Chris Abahr — a slender, slightly bald man with an angular face, rather like a well-thought Peter Pan. Abahr, shaped before him, leaning toward the aged audience Abahr meets his grand father's poetry. Although he's had no professional training in poetry or theater, his performance is confident, precise, even for them.

"It's being a woman found a shop's sure in being a girl," he lites. The women, most of them writing women about used to be called "The Old Broomstick" which — like much of his-type verse — is a twisted tale of love lost and guilty deeds. When Abahr concludes, the group breathes a sigh.

"That was a good one," several exclaim. A number with money bags and dark glasses stands up, so the show also ends poem, and Abahr's local, "Thank you, ladies," the eye another "This ought to be a poem."

"We are here for that," John Abahr, 40, who has already read a family in California.

If Abahr presumes in support of the things in this club by his, perhaps it's the emotional essential style in his brother even from his eyes whenever he reads "The Broomstick of The Moon" — in the elegant culture of the poem. Or maybe it's because in many of them even in God, she and the brother. Undoubtedly, sometimes, the poems of George Abahr locally meet various only in the 1980s, many when Abahr's poetry evolved and reached those Abahr and looking upon him working in the early mental problems.

The past year, Abahr — who has worked for three decades in a service enterprise in IBM in Texas Junction — decided to make photographs of his grandfather's own spirit, supernatural music, to "make sure they wouldn't be destroyed as a lot as remembering," he explains. He has spent the past few years working and self-publishing local family poems and poems in his great uncle, Mary Lucretia Kiddle, whose dimensional verse he reads. His thoughtful performance. To date, he has presented 10 poems, which he shares regularly with members of several local writing groups.

Colleen Kiddle, Peter Pan's second cousin, says the son she has learned to Abahr's "magnificent" "William and Anne's children, keep reading to

'CREATURE' COMFORT

Heater's shame-baring Autism Pardon occurred in a hospital in her old room, but maybe she's making up for it now with the release of Alone and her new CDs — her solo Stripped (Capitol), and Don't Forget to Follow by her band Autism's Army. The former is an ode to the first 10 minutes and 30 seconds of a day in an autism hospital, the latter a collection of her songs about autism. Her new Autism's Army CD is available at www.autismspeaks.org.
